

79th Annual Meeting of

The West Texas Historical Association

April 5 - 6,2002

Angelo State University San Angelo, Texas On the cover: The sign, The Rainbow's End, was developed from a deal that two oil men made in buying two Dodge cars in 1925. The sign was put into place April 1926 and spanned Chadbourne Street between the Central National Bank and Baker-Hemphill Company. (photo courtesy of West Texas Collection)

According to the Standard-Times, the oil men and the car dealership could not come to terms on the vehicles but offered to give half of the difference "to some benefaction of the city... the deal was made, with $118 pledged toward it by each of the contracting parties." Soon the idea of a sign came up, and other businesses chipped in to pay for it. Part of the deal was that West Texas Utilities Company would furnish, free of charge, the electricity needed to operate the sign.

The Rainbow's End continued to be the slogan for the city of San Angelo for over a decade until the sign blew down during a West Texas sand storm. The sign was never replaced.

(Tiny) Hayes, and Roy Reagan. Houston Harte was the owner of the newspaper. Offices were located on Chadbourne Street.

This is the office of Wells Fargo in San Angelo c. 1908-1909. One of the most unusual things about the photo is that it is directly across from the current Wells Fargo Bank on Beauregard! The agent at the time of the photo was W.B. Burns (in gray pants and white shirt).

D uring the 1949 polio epidemic, Shannon physicians and staff took the lead in caring for patients needing the intensive treatment the disease demanded.

That same leadership is evident today as the providers of Shannon Clinic and Shannon Medical Center continue the legacy of Margaret and J.M. Shannon to provide high quality care to the people of the Concho Valley.

For more than sixty years, the people of Shannon have served the citizens of San Angelo and the Concho Valley. Our dedication to the values of our benefactors remains strong and at the center of our mission.
